

Abstract

In a MOS array, current loss at distances further away from the drain and source contacts 5 is compensated for by adjusting the length of the polygate. In an array with drain and source contacts near the middle of the structure, the length of the polygate tapers off along the width of the polygate towards both ends of the polygate.